"Once U.S. troops leave, the Taliban is sure to challenge Kabul one way or the other."

The Remnants of an Army, a famous oil on canvas by the 19th century artist Elizabeth Butler, is a lasting image of the First Anglo-Afghan War (1839-1842). It depicts William Brydon, a medical officer in the British Indian Army, arriving in Jalalabad from Kabul on horseback in 1842. Both Brydon, who was wounded, and his horse look exhausted. Brydon was the only survivor of the 16,000 soldiers and camp followers who were retreating from Kabul after the British invasion went awry.

One hundred and thirty-seven years later, the Soviet Union sent troops to Afghanistan to bolster its client communist regime. A decade passed before the Soviet troops too withdrew in ignominy. And again in 2001, the U.S., the sole superpower of the post-Soviet world, sent troops to Afghanistan launching its 'War on Terror'. Now, after 17 years of the war, with the U.S. and the Taliban agreeing 'in-principle' to a framework for peace that would provide the Americans a face-saving exit from Afghanistan, it's hard to miss the echoes from history.

Repeating mistakes of the past

Afghanistan has historically been a difficult place for external invaders, thanks to its complex tribal equations and its rugged mountainous terrain. It's a classic example of a country whose geopolitical destiny is defined by geography. The British Empire sent troops to Afghanistan in 1839 as part of the 'Great Game'. They feared that the Russians would take over Afghanistan and be at the border of India, "the jewel in the British Crown". To pre-empt that, they conquered Kabul, toppled the Emir of Afghanistan, Dost Mohammad Khan, and installed their protege Shah Shujah Durrani in power. When the invasion became unsustainable in the wake of the violent resistance by tribal fighters, mainly the faction led by Dost Mohammad's son, Akbar Khan, the British decided to withdraw. But while withdrawing, all their troops but Brydon were massacred, and Dost Mohammad went on to recapture Kabul.

The Soviets made the same mistake. They sent troops to Afghanistan after an intra-party coup in the country. The Soviets were wary of Hafizullah Amin, who captured power after assassinating Nur Mohammad Taraki, the leader of the 1978 communist coup. In December 1979, Leonid Brezhnev deployed troops to Afghanistan. The Soviets staged another coup, murdered Amin, and installed Babrak Karmal, a Moscow loyalist, as President. Given their defeat in the Vietnam War and their loss of Iran following the 1979 Revolution, the Americans saw the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan as an opportunity. They began supporting the mujahideen, the tribal warriors who were fighting both the communist regime and its Soviet backers, with help from Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, which were worried about the expansion of communism to the Muslim world. A decade later, the Soviets realised that the occupation had become unsustainable and pulled back.

When the U.S. decided to attack the Taliban regime in Afghanistan in 2001, President George W. Bush said the 'War on Terror' would not end "until every terrorist group of global reach has been found, stopped and defeated". This was a tall order. The U.S. toppled the Taliban quickly and Afghanistan eventually got an elected government under President Hamid Karzai. But after 17 years of fighting, the war has reached nowhere. Since 2009, when the United Nations started documenting the casualties of the war, nearly 20,000 Afghan civilians have been killed in conflict and another 50,000 wounded. The U.S., which has spent some $877 billion on the war, has lost at least 2,000 military personnel in Afghanistan since the war began.

An unsustainable war

And what did it get in return? The Taliban, which retreated in 2001, is on the comeback trail. Some estimates suggest that nearly half of Afghanistan, mostly the mountainous hinterlands, is now controlled by the Taliban. In the east, a small cell of the Islamic State is well-entrenched and has carried out a series of sectarian attacks in recent months, killing hundreds of Hazara Shias. The government is grappling with chronic corruption, and regional satraps call the shots outside Kabul.

U.S. President Donald Trump has made it clear many times that he wants to bring American troops back home. Yet he decided to send more troops to Afghanistan in 2017 to step up the fight against the Taliban. Since then, the U.S. has carried out large-scale air operations in Afghanistan, but it has failed to arrest the Taliban's momentum. The group continues to hold sway in rural Afghanistan and retains the capability to strike anywhere in the country. Just since 2014, Afghanistan has lost some 45,000 soldiers in battle. Amid mounting losses and an inability to break the stalemate in the conflict, the Americans, like the British Empire in the 19th century and the Soviets in the 20th century, seem to have realised that the first major war of the 21st century is no longer sustainable.

The role of the Taliban

The question is, what next? The U.S. says it has got assurance from the Taliban that the group won't provide a safe haven to terror groups in Afghanistan. It will also push for a ceasefire and intra-Afghan talks. But the fact remains that the U.S. has already conceded a lot to the Taliban. The Taliban said it would not talk to the Afghan administration; it does not acknowledge the government's legitimacy. The Americans accepted this and held direct talks with the insurgents, who negotiated from a position of strength. The U.S. has also agreed, in principle, to pull out troops, the biggest Taliban demand, without any clear agreement on the future role of the Taliban. This shows how desperate the U.S. is to get out of Afghanistan, a war it has lost badly. It will be exiting on terms largely dictated by the Taliban. It would be naive to say that the Taliban fought the war for 17 years only to reach an agreement with the Americans. It fought for power, which it lost with the arrival of American troops in 2001. And it's certain that once the Americans leave, the Taliban will challenge Kabul one way or the other.

America- Afghanistan War

Why in the discussion?

- Recently, significant progress has been made in Afghanistan to end the ongoing 17-year conflict.
- The US and the Taliban have agreed on the draft of the Peace Agreement.
- US Special Envoy Jalme Khaliljad said on Monday that there has been a theoretical agreement on the outline of the peace agreement between the US officials and Taliban representatives.
- Under this, the militant organization will guarantee the Afghan land not to become the hub of terrorists.
- All US soldiers can return from Afghanistan after the Taliban talks and Afghan ceasefire with the Afghan government.

Problem

- The Taliban ruled in Afghanistan from 1996 to 2001 on the basis of harsh Islamic Sharia law.
- Now the Taliban say that it does not want monopoly on power and it will not pose a threat to other countries.
- But many analysts fear that after the complete return of NATO troops, the weak and corrupt government of Afghanistan can collapse or the new civil war can begin, in which millions have already been killed.
- The Afghan government supported by the western countries is considered to be extremely corrupt and incompetent. People are complaining about the dearth of public services, insecurity and infiltration.
- After the removal of the Taliban government in 2001, women have got new freedom, but there is still a lot of restrictions in the highly conservative society.
- Even after 17 years of the end of the Taliban regime, Afghanistan is among the worst countries for women.

Why is Afghanistan important to India?

- Afghanistan is strategically important due to being located at the intersection of Asia because it connects South Asia to Central Asia and Central Asia to the Middle East.
- India's contact with Iran, Azerbaijan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan is through Afghanistan. Therefore, Afghanistan is very important for India.
- Afghanistan is also important for India as geo-strategic as it is located between India and Central Asia, which provides business facilities.
- This country is strategically located in oil and gas rich Middle East and Central Asia, which provides it an important geospatial position.
- Afghanistan becomes an important place for pipeline routes. Along with this, Afghanistan is also rich in natural resources like precious metals and minerals.

Economic cooperation

- Afghanistan is the second largest destination for export of India. In Afghanistan, many minerals like gold, iron, copper etc. are prominently available. Indian companies have invested in them for mining.
- More than 100 companies have invested in different industries of Afghanistan including agriculture, communication, information technology etc.
- The proposed TAPI (Turkmenistan, Afghanistan, Pakistan and India) pipeline passes through Afghanistan. This is to import natural gas from Turkmenistan to India.
- India, Iran and Afghanistan have jointly signed a trade agreement. The purpose of this deal is to invest in the Chhabar port to make accessible the land area of Afghanistan by surrounding Pakistan.

Expected Questions (Prelims Exams)

1. Consider the following statements-

1. Only Turkmenistan, Afghanistan, Pakistan and India are included in TAPI project.
2. Through this, India will import oil and gas from Turkmenistan.

Which of the above statements are correct?

- (a) Only 1
- (b) Only 2
- (c) Both 1 and 2
- (d) Neither 1 nor 2

Expected Questions (Mains Exams)

- Q. After the return of American Army from Afghanistan, there is a probability of which challenges being created in front of India? Discuss.
